The lipid assembly in the primitive cell membrane in the earliest stages of evolution and its transition to the modern cell membrane are the major questions in modern cell evolution. The complexity of the transition, such as membrane selectivity and the degree of curvature of primitive membranes, has puzzled scholars. Here, we report a microfluidic approach to mimic cellular microenvironment and study the membrane morphogenesis over time in the pioneering stage of cellular evolution. The spontaneous vesicle formation in the microfluidic channels reproduced the characteristics of primitive lipid vesicles in primitive cells in the context of a low osmolarity, high polymer concentration (Pi) cell culture environment and in a high Pi concentration liquid culture media. The vesicle morphology and the related mechanisms were characterized with fluorescent probes and atomic force microscopy (AFM). The formation of vesicles in the Pi-rich environment is attributed to the surface-active agent molecules in the medium. The formation time of vesicles in microfluidics was between 8 and 36 hours, which is much shorter than in a simulated cellular environment. This microfluidic approach may be useful to study the lipid segregation and vesicle formation and their transition to the cell membrane.1. Field of the Invention The invention relates to an apparatus for printing out a check of the kind which is provided with a card and/or a data entry device for entering certain data to the latter and with a printer for printing the information contained in the check on the card. 2. Description of the Prior Art Prior-art devices of the kind described have the disadvantage that the printer must be placed on top of a data entry device in a certain position before it can be used, which in many practical cases means that the user must bend over to the degree of inclination that the device is designed for. Furthermore, the printing of the check can be effected in only one direction, the direction of the device which contains 0cc13bf012

In 1981 he started his career as a scriptwriter and director, a position he held from 1984 to 1987. He also directed four films, the last ones in 1998. Born in Buenos Aires, in 1968 he received his degree in Dramatic Arts from the National Theatre School and began to publish his first plays in a daily magazine, although a couple of years later he moved to Channel 7, where he specialized in dramatic series. The first of his series was Una familia con problemas (1978), adapted to various countries where it was successful. In 1981 he wrote the script of Los amores de la ira (Love hurts), which was the first Argentine film to be selected for the Academy Award, won by Juan José Campanella and Sergio Renán. He also wrote the script of El tigre herido (The wounded tiger) and El páramo (The prairie), in which he acted and directed. He also participated in Ocho y medio (Eighteen and a half), a film about the terrorism of the military government in Argentina. In 1985 he directed a science fiction film called El lío (The mess). In 1987 he wrote El jardín de la tarde (The afternoon garden) and directed Un anillo de amor (An engagement ring). In 1988 he directed the second Argentine film to be selected for the Academy Award, a film called El bebé Pérez. Works Los amores de la ira (Love hurts) (1981), based on a novel by Jorge Luis Borges El bebé Pérez El jardín de la tarde Ocho y medio (Eighteen and a half) Cara paloma (1987) Vientos en G Amantes de G (1989) Cacera Las primicias de la violencia (1990) La huida del visco (The squeak of the visc) (
