Bless you for revealing your site. between the experimental and control groups. On the other hand, we found that the training over a longer period resulted in better learning. And this is again confirmed by the ease of learning, which was good on the first day of the experiment, but slowed down on the second day. After the second day, it continued until the end of the experiment. Another factor that was important was the instructor's role. He was really there to guide us and help us navigate the scary waters of virtual learning. All the above factors are controllable, and for a student who wants to take measures to overcome the fears and anxiety of online learning, these may be interesting starting points. Q: Best way of mapping one type to another? I am new to Scala. What is the best way of mapping one type to another? For instance what is the best way of mapping an object to a string in Scala? How about mapping a Map to a List? A: This is a poor question because there are no "best ways" of mapping types in Scala. No question is ever going to be asked, e.g., "How do I map from a HashMap to a Vector?" Instead, you need to ask questions like: What types do I want to convert from, and to? What does the conversion need to be lossless or what does the conversion need to preserve types? How do I want to guarantee that my conversion is consistent between different types? If you don't have answers to these questions, then you don't really have a question. You might get some answers by exploring the type
