In fact, a recent review by Lave et al., addressing the issue of global screening for cardiovascular disease, summarized the main pitfalls of the currently available methods [@bb0005]. Firstly, specific tests with evidence of utility have not been identified. Secondly, adequate sensitivity and specificity of the test have not been demonstrated in the target population. Thirdly, there is a lack of cost-effective and easy-to-use system that can be applied to wide scale screening [@bb0005]. In line with the above mentioned limitations, the criteria to investigate general cardiovascular risk in the asymptomatic population are usually based on statistical evidence of the link between certain risk factors and cardiovascular event [@bb0005]. However, cardiovascular risk assessments based on the above mentioned statistics may ignore the important factor that the relationship between low-to-moderate risk factors and events is generally weak [@bb0010]. Therefore, the use of universal screening criteria in the general population, regardless of the risk level of each individual, may not be a good choice for the entire population. In this issue of the journal, the association between cardiovascular risk and cardiac event, as well as the relationship between cardiovascular risk factors and other markers, has been further examined. In a prospective cohort study of 500,000 participants, it was shown that a higher estimated cardiovascular risk predicted an increased risk of cardiovascular events. However, the link between estimated risk and cardiovascular events was only statistically significant for events that were not fatal [@bb0015]. This finding demonstrates the importance of the outcomes of cardiac events in the cardiovascular risk assessment, considering that some of these events are not fatal. Further, the researchers showed that estimated risk was associated
