This download comes with deep breathing and a throbbing pleasure you may or may not experience.Q: What is a good use of (and without) a content type? This is the view after creating a (basic) content type. I also created a view of page nodes to list the content types. This is a list of 10 content types on the left, and the view page node display of each on the right. The node form has title, body and 2 context filters, so that is why. The left navigation is for selecting a content type: Project, Activity, News, Video, Image, Blog and Note. Is there a different way to do this? Or is this actually the best method? Is there a reason why the views quick tab doesn't have an Advanced settings button? A: Is there a different way to do this? Or is this actually the best method? No, it's not the best method. There is no need to split the content types into "hierarchy" nodes; for this, it's enough to create a "flat" content type node, and you can create multiple fields for them: the summary, the body, etc. In other words, this tree is a good way to visualize your data, but there is no need to have that kind of split. See these questions, for example: How to create a custom block for all nodes of a content type Create a content type for the system used by a CCK plugin There is also a content type taxonomy. This is a good way to create multiple content types from one node, but it's not a tree, it's a flat-list of content types. The only need for this kind of "tree" is to show your content types in the tree, to identify them more easily, because if you have created multiple content types, it's not trivial to identify them from a flat list. Is there a reason why the views quick tab doesn't have an Advanced settings button? If you want to create a page tree of your content types, you can create a views display of "pages" (with content type), and use contextual filters to filter the results by your content type and the presence of "page 3e33713323
