A: I don't know any specific formula for this probability. I would just use a trial and error, and start at the low end of the value, and then adjust as needed. A team of archeologists have made a major discovery in Mexico's northern Yucatan Peninsula. The limestone cave contained a hodgepodge of human remains, implements, weapons, and ornaments. It is similar to findings in northern Europe, Asia, and Africa, and it appears that the site predates the oldest known human settlement in North America. The findings, to be unveiled at the American Anthropological Association's meeting in January, come from the Cueva de Marino Cave in central Mexico. It was recently studied by scientists from the University of Mississippi, University of Austin, the University of Illinois at Chicago, and the University of Wisconsin. "We've interpreted some kind of cave dweller's presence at the site," says David Meltzer, director of the University of Mississippi Anthropological Research Facility. "And this in itself is a rare find, because we've got no other evidence of ancient cave dwellers anywhere in the Americas." Meltzer and his colleagues will tell the story of the small ruins and art they found during the excavation. They will not say exactly how long it has been there. But they strongly suspect it is much older than the people who made it. The ruins are in north of the Yucatan Peninsula in a region called the Río Bec region. To arrive at the cave, Meltzer and his team walked nearly three hours through a deep jungle of tropical vegetation. They reached a narrow, shallow valley filled with water. The team climbed down a series of ledges and through dense brush, wading the small river several times. And finally they stood on an ancient, smooth beach of black, flat limestone, the roof of a cave. Once they got there, and after a three-hour excavation, Meltzer says they had a good idea of what the cave would turn up. "We dug in the location where we thought those particular artifacts had been found," he says. "If you look across a wide region you can see the settlement pattern of the people who made the art and other things." That means that the cave was filled with their garbage and other man-made objects they left behind. There was also the body of a young, adult man who had been shot. At some point in time, someone had tried to dig him out of the cave and get rid of his bones.
