A pharmacokinetic study of mefloquine (Lariam(R)) was performed in five healthy volunteers after oral dosing with 100 mg. Blood samples were taken at intervals after the dose. The samples were subjected to a three-step liquid-liquid extraction procedure prior to determination of the concentration of mefloquine (and its metabolite 5-hydroxy-mefloquine) by a sensitive and selective high-performance liquid chromatography (HPLC) method. During the observation period of 48 h after dosing, mefloquine showed a maximum concentration of 6.2 microg/ml. In contrast, its metabolite reached a maximum concentration of only 1.2 microg/ml at the earliest, i.e. 72 h after dosing. The AUC(48 h) for mefloquine was within the range of 200-300 microg.h/ml, and for the metabolite only about 40 microg.h/ml was observed. In comparison, desbutylmefloquine, whose concentration-time course has been studied previously in the same subject population, reached a maximum concentration of about 37 microg/ml at 48 h. The observed inter-individual differences in the kinetic parameters of mefloquine are interpreted to reflect the different degrees of inhibition of cytochrome P450-mediated metabolism as a result of differences in the affinity
