the owner of the pets or the owner of the residence to be convicted, the State must prove, as an element of the offense that the owner knew that the dog was a dangerous animal. This requirement ensures that the State will prove that the animal's dangerousness is not a mere form of negligence. The law also provides for loss to be measured on the basis of what the owner knew or did not know about the animal's dangerousness, rather than on the basis of whether or not the owner had attained the criminal culpability for the dangerousness of the animal. Revocation of license §24-06-18. (1) Any owner of a dangerous animal who, during the period in which the dangerous animal is licensed, commits any of the following shall have his or her license revoked by the state veterinarian or, if the state veterinarian determines, the animal control officer responsible for issuing the license or, in their absence, a county attorney designated by the county attorney's office: (a) having knowledge of a dangerous animal, who owns, possesses, controls, keeps, feeds, or has in his or her care, custody, or control, any dangerous animal or any premises where dangerous animals are kept, unless such dangerous animal has a permit as provided in this chapter; (b) failing to give notice to the state veterinarian of any injury or damage arising out of the ownership, possession, care, custody, or control of a dangerous animal; or (c) allowing any dangerous animal to be present in any building without notifying the state veterinarian or, in their absence, the animal control officer responsible for issuing the license, of the dangerous animal's presence or lack of presence, or of the owner's knowledge of the presence or lack of presence of the dangerous animal. (2) Whenever the revocation of a license is required by the provisions of subsection

The study provides the latest information on the major causes of disease and injury, the burden from these causes in both developed and developing countries, and the main barriers to health, such as poverty and inequality. One of the key components of the study is the approach it takes to measuring the burden of disease. This involves analyzing more than 90 million deaths and over a hundred million healthy years of life lost annually, and its researchers account for the wide range of different contexts in which these events occur, such as by sex, age, and income level. The GBD provides estimates of such things as maternal and child mortality, the likelihood of individuals surviving the different diseases, and health outcomes for women and children, in different contexts around the world. It estimates the number of years of healthy life lost to ill health in different parts of the world, and the cost of health care, as well as analyzing the current distribution of health across the world. The GBD is the world's most comprehensive source of data and analysis on global health. It provides information on the burden of disease, injury, and risk factors in 291 countries and territories, with estimates on a range of health and health-related outcomes. The GBD is prepared by collaborators from public and private institutions, including 0cc13bf012
