of the Invention The present invention relates generally to surface texture analysis for cosmetic and other materials, and more specifically to surface texture analysis for spray-on cosmetics and other cosmetics that are applied to the skin. 2. Description of the Related Art For decades, cosmetic products have been used on the skin to change the appearance of the skin. For example, lipstick has been used to make the lips darker. The traditional method for determining an appropriate color of lipstick was to apply the lipstick to a human model's lips in the presence of a doctor and then remove the lipstick for a final judgment of whether the lipstick was acceptable to the doctor. This was a trial and error method that resulted in much time and effort spent by the cosmetic industry and the subject of the lips. Over time, the test became very unreliable for a variety of reasons including that the doctor could misinterpret the look of the lips based on factors other than the lipstick, the doctor could be motivated to select the best looking lipstick for the subject, the subject could be "faking" the lip color in order to improve the appearance of their lips, and the subject could be presenting variations of the same look to the doctor. In light of the above, many professional and lay experts have developed a method for determining the proper color of lipstick for a given subject. A lip swatch is a small portion of the subject's lips that is visually compared to the color of a lipstick. Lip swatches have been conventionally used as a reference to determine the color of a lipstick. For example, a lip swatch of the same color, i.e. the same shade, may be compared to a different lipstick that is perceived by the user as being similar in color, i.e. the same shade. Accordingly, an experienced user of lipstick determines the shade of the lipstick based on the similarities and differences among similar lipsticks. The user may make a color chart, which shows the color of a particular lipstick in comparison to other similarly colored lipsticks. The user then selects a lipstick having the same color as, i.e. the same shade of, the desired lipstick. While the above process is relatively straightforward for professional lipstick users, especially those users with extensive training in color, the process is laborious for non-professional users, such as, for example, a family with young children or a professional lipstick user with limited training in the proper use of color. As a result, traditional methods are impractical. bff6bb2d33
