Allows you to save QuickReports to any of the following formats: Lotus 123, Quattro Pro, Excel, Bitmap, JPEG, CSS2, HTML, PDF and RTF.Q: generics in javascript mapping I would like to loop through a list of items using a function that accepts an item type, and this collection will contain item1, item2, item3....etc and the function should be able to work on them. In java, I would declare the function and the parameter as the same generic type "T" and then I could use wildcards "T" for the loop. I guess in javascript we don't have the same possibilities. Could you please point me in the right direction? Thanks A: There is no way to do generics in Javascript (well not in the browser... in ES6 we have Proxy for that kind of work, but only in strict mode). If you want to have some kind of interface/superclass, you could try the Polymer library which is a good javascript library with a lot of bindings to native browser elements, or you could use the Mootools library. I've never used them, but they both have a bunch of different libraries that can help you do things with the DOM. I think that's all there is to it. Q: Nginx Forwarding Multiple URLs With Any Port I currently have a server running nginx on ubuntu to handle my static content. I have multiple URLs for that server that need to be served up to the user. All the urls are under the same domain name, let's say www.example.com and they all map to port 80. I know this could be done using another host, but for the sake of simplicity, I don't want to do this. What I would like to do is forward all these URLs to the same port. So if my URL looks like this: I would like nginx to forward that request to port 80 and map it to: I've been trying to work with this directive but to no avail: server { listen 80; listen [::]:80; server_name www.example.com; return 301
