I have a situation where I have a build server that is used to build a Docker image, run some tests against it, and then deploy that image to a cluster of docker hosts. I have what I believe to be a fairly standard set up: A build configuration file that specifies the type of test to run, and how to run it A script that runs all the tests (although I'm not sure if this is a best practice - I'm relatively new to using this kind of thing and get to the end point where I'm running things using bash) The build server also syncs itself with a git repository so I can run "rebase -i" to update all the build files without having to do it manually. The thing is - I think there's a 2s lag in the server with regards to when my test scripts run. Occasionally, I'll be mid-test and see something like "test result is Passed (0 of 3):" followed by "test result is Failed (1 of 3):" Having looked at the SSH logs, there aren't any errors, just some warnings about the build not running on all hosts, and a lot of "idleness" messages - there are a lot of "sleeping for 4 seconds" messages. The build server is running on AWS with Ubuntu 16.04 and Ubuntu 16.10. What are the things I can do to fix this? A: From my experience, testing an installation script of a deployed software is the hardest part. Some tools are test automation tools that check and run tests on the code that we are developing. If you run tests from time to time, it is enough to eliminate bugs in the code. Other tools are build automation tools that run tests on the code that has been built. They are b7e8fd5c8
