Fructose-1,6-bisphosphatase catalyzes the removal of fructose-1,6-bisphosphate from the cell, and is a key regulatory enzyme in the body. The enzyme is not a member of the two-component-phosphate-binding protein family. Instead, the protein is a homodimer of identical 24-kDa subunits. The mechanism by which the reaction takes place is complex and involves substrate transport in an ordered manner. The enzyme has two sites, one for substrate, and the other for fructose-1,6-bisphosphate. The enzyme forms a ternary complex with fructose-1,6-bisphosphate and Mg<sup>2+</sup> to catalyze the reaction. By comparison, inorganic phosphate bound to the enzyme at the enzyme active site, rather than Mg<sup>2+</sup>, is the rate-limiting factor in the overall reaction, at low concentrations of substrate. The enzyme displays a cooperative response to substrate. It requires the presence of fructose-1,6-bisphosphate to bind catalytically to the active site, but this binding is the rate-limiting factor at low substrate concentrations. The enzyme is regulated by metabolic enzymes and by allosteric proteins. This regulation is often due to altered affinities of the protein for either activating or inhibitory anions such as pyrophosphate, phosphate, and ADP. Q: From two turtles that have been given a choice, what is the most likely strategy? In my game, turtles have two options: kill or be killed. I'm looking to give turtles
