Consumers have long been skeptical about whether the private sector can deliver the high levels of customer service that are required to keep them loyal. Providing great customer service is particularly important for network operators since customer loyalty is often the difference between being profitable and not, and customer satisfaction is an important determinant of customer retention. As customer expectations continue to rise for high levels of customer service and service quality, network operators can no longer rely upon their historical operational experience to meet customer expectations. On the other hand, new service offerings and change of use decisions are creating new service provider management challenges. This report examines current thinking and issues around customer service from a number of perspectives, and provides a framework for network operators to develop and monitor customer service strategies. It is based on extensive interviews and in-depth studies of both public and private sector customer service organizations across a wide range of industries. Includes • an examination of current thinking and issues around customer service • an examination of service quality determinants and influences • an identification of new service provider management challenges including a discussion of why the private sector is increasingly dependent on a one-off use of the network.
