Q: is there something like auto-bind for typed arrays? I am working on an editor for a WebGL 2.0 game. In it I have a component to build entities by a 'structure' concept, because I need to be able to build a tree structure of entities to draw them. I thought a nice way to do that would be to define a 'structure' component, and I can make it so that when given a structure it generates appropriate entities for it. the second step is to define a property in the structure to hold an array of these entities so I can bind the existing array. however right now I'm thinking that the structure component would have to generate a typed array that does the same thing as a native array and gives it all the same accessors, then there is nothing stopping the structure from accepting a typed array as well. problem is that I have an unfortunate lack of knowledge regarding typed arrays are there any alternatives to this, some way to auto-bind? does having to make your own array seems something where there is a handy binding like there is for the Object type? A: Typed Arrays are designed to be passed around, they are not meant to be used directly inside a Constructor, they should be passed by reference to a constructor. You could use Uint8Array instead and get close to native functions, they can be subclassed and have some extra functions. You should implement inheritance for your structures, that will help you get access to the array (as your collections) inside a constructor. There is a new proposal for Typed
