This technology uses an unrivaled combination of physical data and machine learning to map player physicality to the on-screen action. Working with the movements of the real-life players, the team at EA used artificial intelligence to evolve the intelligence of the game to make it feel more life-like. This was achieved through a combination of “creating a new physics engine that creates a high level of immersion” and “developing an AI system that completely frees us from the limitations of players that were designed by humans.” The game is driven by the mathematics, not just the physics engine. “The end result is a feeling of authenticity with all the nuances of the real game.” EA have partnered with universities to capture 22 elite football players, from legends like Zinedine Zidane to rising stars like Trent Alexander-Arnold. The data is being used to help create new visual features, as well as to overhaul the type of movements and challenges the players are facing in the game. “We use deep neural networks to learn the game on millions of frames,” he explains. “We have artificial intelligence that learns from the data and picks up on patterns and presents them to the player.” The data is collected at matches and during practices as players use every trick in the book to get through the match unscathed. “We don't necessarily want it to be perfect, but perfect for us.” “We collect hundreds of millions of frames of data,” says Kelly. “We also use the motion capture data from the players and use that to train machine learning and our AI. We watch as the players play. After each match, we collect the data, the AI learns and with every update we feed in a new AI, a new machine learning, new data. Every day it gets better. Every match it gets better.” Of course, player movement isn’t the only aspect of the game that has been re-engineered, with AI characters and tactics further integrating the game’s artificial intelligence. For example, EA’s proprietary game AI, known as the ‘Learning Environment’, will be used in FIFA 22. “The Learning Environment is the engine of the future,
