Currently, mobile phones are one of the most popular types of handheld computing devices. And, as more mobile phones include advanced features, such as pagers and address books, and become more powerful in processing capabilities, many people are carrying both a mobile phone and a PDA. Often, a user will need to view information stored in their PDA and maintain the context of the user when viewing information in the mobile phone. For example, when using a mobile phone to view a document stored in a PDA, it is desirable to maintain the context of the user, which is usually the location of the user when viewing the document. If the user wants to preserve the context of where they viewed the document, the user will have to make manual decisions on how to preserve the context of the user when viewing the document. Most PDAs only include a single physical screen that displays an image. When the user needs to preserve the context of where the user is viewing the document, the user must manually relocate the document to a different location on the PDA before the document can be printed out or saved to a different location. This also requires the user to have to separately view the document again later. Other PDAs include a second screen, which is a digital camera, that is physically attached to the PDA. If the user needs to preserve the context of where the user is viewing the document, the user will have to manually rotate the physical screen 180 degrees before the document can be printed out or saved to a different location. This requires the user to have to physically re-locate the document to a different location on the PDA before the document can be printed out or saved to a different location. Therefore, a need exists in the industry to overcome the problems associated with the prior art.For publication in the journal, contact: Sochi power plant operation The Sochi power plant went into full operation on March 24, 2018.
