So, an app I am developing is about a math lesson. I've started working on the server side, and am having trouble thinking of a way to handle a failed login. A user checks out the site The user fills out a form to check out the site The user enters his/her password into a form The server checks the login If the login is successful, the user is prompted to fill out the form as normal But what if the user fills out the form, then the server gets a request to destroy the user? What I want to do is take the information that the user provided and submit it to a database. It doesn't seem like I can do that without knowing the username, and right now I can't store the user's username. A: Another option would be to store the user data in a session attribute or in a hidden input field. This way, if the user forgets the password or his login is compromised, then the data in the session or in the hidden input 6d1f23a050
