have an NTFS partition which contains about 1TB of files. My objective is to prevent the possibility of my NTFS partition suddenly being corrupted and having to rebuild everything. I know that my partition contains a couple hundred files which have never changed since I created the partition and any modifications since I created it were never to the files and will remain valid (I'm making the assumption that no other process has ever been running when the partition was last created). The partition is used by several different users, with their own files and folders. The files are not sorted. I have a couple of concerns which I would like to resolve: How can I check the entire partition for hash collisions? Should I be checking for file modification times in addition to file hashes? I'm on Windows 7. Any advice would be appreciated. A: You can use the Master File Table (MFT) to verify the file hashes. You can do this with an external tool such as the Windows Data Preparation Toolkit which contains a tool called FileHashes which will scan the MFT and find only files for which the FileHashes tool finds a perfect match. There's no need to scan the whole partition, only the MFT. You don't want to depend on the file system being up in the future. That would mean you need to scan the partition before hand. Then the future won't be dependent on the file system being up. This is a big problem. If you depend on the file system being up you lose any hope of a contingency plan. regulatory regime of the EU that was put into place in order to try to tackle fraud.

The aim of this operation is to stop fraudulent activity from being carried out by crossing borders within the European Union and to support the EU's objective of making the single market work better for businesses. In June 2011, the European Commission issued a second circular known as "On preventing the misuse of electronic money". This includes a number of new rules that start to govern the operation of money remitters within the EU. This second circular also forms a key part of this regulatory regime. These
