knife attacker . .A comparison of the potential long-term health effects of gaseous fuel and compressed natural gas. In the U.S. natural gas market, compressed natural gas

(CNG) vehicles have been promoted as a solution to our gasoline resource shortage in the near term, and as a potential permanent solution in the long term. Biogenic CNG is produced in the U.S. by conversion of methane to hydrogen and carbon monoxide in a process similar to the one used in the Haber-Bosch process to produce ammonia for fertilizers. Biogenic CNG fuel comprises approximately 80% of the world's fuel supply, and in the U.S. is imported in liquid form (100% pure) from Canada, Norway, and Mexico. Several companies have introduced biogenic CNG into the U.S. fleet markets in California, Michigan, New Jersey, Texas, North Carolina, and Illinois, and the number of CNG vehicles has grown to approximately 3,000,000 vehicles today. A comparison of CNG fuel and conventional gasoline was made to determine the potential long-term health effects of emissions from CNG vehicles. The National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey (NHANES), conducted by the National Center for Health Statistics, was used to evaluate differences in the potential long-term health effects of emissions from vehicles operating on either gaseous fuel or gasoline.
