A method for isolating and culturing intestinal epithelial stem cells from the small intestine of newborn BALB/C mice. The small intestine of newborn BALB/C mice is a complex organ that contains stem cells that are distinct from intestinal stem cells present in the adult small intestine. We found these small intestine stem cells in vitro cultures of newborn BALB/C mouse small intestine. Primary cultures of small intestine stem cells did not survive in serum-free medium. After fibroblast growth factor 2 (FGF-2) treatment, these primary cultures started to proliferate. Cell subpopulations were detected by cell-surface markers, the number of cells in secondary cultures gradually increased with increased FGF-2 concentration. Small intestine stem cells in secondary cultures could be identified by expression of anti-cytokeratin 20 (CK20), CD133 and CD49f. CK20+CD133+CD49f+ small intestine stem cells could be propagated in vitro using a serum-free medium supplemented with FGF-2 and basic fibroblast growth factor (bFGF). They could be effectively isolated and cultured in specific serum-free medium supplemented with FGF-2. Your online marketing strategy should always be ahead of the game.
