December 21, 2012 at 05:33 amWho loves this? If you're out of money, you are probably going to find someone who loves it. You will give it to them. You might not think so at first, but you will. Why? It works. Money is the limiting factor, and it just works. If they don't have any money, they can borrow from you. What they want to borrow is based on how much money they make. If they make $100 a month, then they'd want to borrow $50. If they make $200, they'd want to borrow $100. What if they can't borrow? Then, they can give you something else instead. Maybe you give them the money to go to the butcher's. They go to the butcher's and buy some sausages and come back and give you the sausages. You buy sausages and give them to your friend to give her. But the friend doesn't want to give her sausages because she likes sausages. She needs the money for something else. That's OK. You probably have something else that you give to people who need money. Maybe you make sausages. Do you want sausages instead of money? Actually, I know you do. It is called a gift economy and you've already been in one. When you borrow from someone, they do the same when you give them money. That is called lending. When you give someone a gift, you are giving, not borrowing. That is called gifting. What are some types of gifts? There are lots. A person might pay you a compliment. A person might bring you a cup of coffee. A person might even give you a blow job. You get the idea. You can borrow money too. You might not want to. This means that you are putting something of your time and energy at risk. It also means that you have lots of time and energy that you could spend on something else. Can I lend money? Yes. But in an economy based on money, money is the limiting factor. If you can find someone with money, and if it doesn't matter that much to you to borrow it, then
